Response
New initiative focused on a celebration of spring called Nowruz, celebrated by a number of different religious groups including Muslim, Zoroastrian, Baha'i, Jewish, and others.
We share on social media when it is a holiday.
We do not do much at all. We have one church that rents our space. We have off some holidays that align with Christian ones.
Staff focused professional development related to religious literacy
We develop traveling exhibits on Sacred Journeys and Sacred Places for families with children
Day of the Dead celebration
virtual programs with story times representing different religions
Cultural celebrations called "Cultural connections"
Altars and icons in our 4 cultural exhibits
Educational programming around diverse cultural holidays
Some cultural events (1-2 days) planned around religious-based celebrations
Community collections programs that invite community members to display objects. Often contributions reflect religious and cultural backgrounds.
We present annual events on celebrations
Day of the Dead celebration
No programming or exhibits
Visit with Santa Claus...Christmas
Bring in community leaders
Cultural celebrations associated with religious holidays
Cultural programming/exhibits
As a science museum, it's often avoided. We do share lots of book resources representing as wide a range of identities as possible throughout the year.
In an effort to be a space for all, we do very little related to any specific religions
Seasons of Sharing, 7 cultural and/or religious celebrations in an annual Nov/Dec exhibit
We mark cultural festivals, many religious in nature, through programs, performances, and interactivity. We undertake these with strong community partnerships to ensure authenticity of content with the goal of making contact
We collect and use the material culture of religion in our experiences
Partnering with religious organizations for cultural activities
Cultural programming for religious holidays
Invite local organizations to take over special days and bring their community to share with others
